FEMA Camps for American Dissidents

The US has a long history of prison camps

The United States operated Native American concentration camps in the 1830s that went on for decades and later evolved into Reservations. During both world wars the United States deployed concentration camps. During world war two, about a thousand indigenous Aleuts of Alaska were forced into camps as their homes were burned to the ground so that invading Japanese forces could not use them. After the war, the United States seized Okinawan homes and burned them to the ground to make way for military bases, forcing three-hundred-thousand civilians into concentration camps. And deliberately starved about a million Germans to death in prison camps.

The Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 led to the construction of concentration camps meant to hold American dissidents. In 1961 the US forced eight million South Vietnamese civilians into prison camps to deprive the Viet Cong of any potential support.

Starting back in the late 90s, Alex Jones has been releasing films warning that people are being conditioned to accept seeing their neighbors rounded up and thrown in prison camps. Such as the WTO protests where hundreds of protesters were arrested and thrown into jail. The 2004 Republican National Convention where over a thousand protesters were arrested and sent to a makeshift prison. And in Katrina where police went door to door confiscating guns.

"The police and National Guard going street by street, house to house, sometimes entering open houses when they were not invited. Location: The Assembly Rooms, High Street, to dis

After 9/11 came the Patriot Act. And American citizens officially became potential enemies of the state.

In 2006, President Bush amended the National Defense Authorization Act to grant the President power to declare martial law. And in 2007, signed Directive 51.

"For the smallest of reasons, included in the documents own text, any incident in the world, regard on,

During COVID, healthy people with no symptoms were arrested and locked in prison camps because they failed a fraudulent PCR test. And if they tried to escape, their fellow prisoners reported them.

"The second she jumped over, we all freaked out because we just wanted to call. Like, to let the wellness people know, let the police know."

Prison camps are being built all over the world. And they are for whoever the government sees as a threat to their agenda.

Indeed Belyi, but the guy who was making the film greyzone in which rows of emaciated men were being guillotined, led to him, his family and his house being destroyed. I must be a fantasy of theirs.
